A VIEW FROM THE HILL

Charoset has hit the big time this spring. From balls of the sticky stuff dipped in chocolate to create charoset truffles to a kosher-for-Passover Ben and Jerry's ice cream, the mixture of chopped fruits, nuts, wine, spices and often honey isn't just for the seder plate anymore.

I'm not sure why this tickles me so much. I'm not Jewish. And though I do enjoy the sweet and spicy and crunchy tang of it, (Karen Farrell made a couple different versions with help from our RE kids a few years back—delicious!), I'm not a charoset connoisseur. And I certainly haven't reacted the same way to an out-of-the-box twist on a traditional Easter food (involving techni-colored deviled eggs) also making the rounds on social media this year.

It may be simply because I've never like deviled eggs, anyway. But I think it's more likely this:

I was taught that charoset represents the mortar Israelite slaves used for building under the rule of Pharaoh (there are theories about other possible meanings). It belongs on the seder plate as part of the story of the Exodus from slavery into freedom of the Promise Land.

And there is something profoundly liberating about taking a symbol of oppression and bondage, and transforming it beyond the ritual matzah sandwich into a tasty, celebratory treat. Or potentially so, anyway.

What hard won freedom from past oppression or bondage to habit or attitude or unhealthy relationships might you celebrate this Passover? What solemn ritual will help you mark leaving it behind? And what fun, sweet, unexpected twist on the ritual might then help you celebrate the freedom while never forgetting how you won it?

Chag Sameach. Happy Easter. See you in church.

During their travels (April 14-April 30) they will have the opportunity to spend three days in our partner church village, Benced. Nora's Church Board will be sending a $500 contribution to the Benced Church. In addition there are ministerial needs that Ildiko Ilkei, Benced's pastor, has mentioned.

The collection at our Easter Brunch will go to help with purchase of a tablet. Your support strengthens our relationship with fellow Unitarians where the roots of our denomination began.

More on Returning to Selma

Many of you have asked for more information about my time in Alabama last month—especially choir members who missed the service on 3/15 when they were singing in Mankato. We'll figure out a time to reshoot the presentation from that service. In the meantime, here are some links to articles and videos that will give you some insight into the experience.
