A View From the Hill

I hear birds early in the morning.

As I write this I'm in nearing the end of my mini-sabbatical, still ensconced in my borrowed apartment 21 floors above downtown Minneapolis. And even here, where all I see when I glance out the window are sky and the tops of tall buildings, such a different view than from my windows at the parsonage, even here, I hear birds early in the morning.

Easter follows the vernal equinox (first day of spring) by a week this year. These two holy days, so intertwined on the calendar and in our collective understanding of creation, proclaim and rejoice, each in its distinct way and message, the triumph of life-everlasting. Life where there seemed to be death. Life out of eggs. Life out of a stone tomb. I know this. I preach this. I've witnessed this. I shouldn't be surprised.

I shouldn't be surprised by birdsong high about the city. Or reconciliations after years' long estrangement. Or a life of service after incarceration. Or love after heartbreak. Sobriety. Spring flowers. Families, children, adults, teens rising strong and beautiful from broken definitions. Or any of the ordinary, miraculous triumphs of life occurring around me every single day. But sometimes gray skies, the daily news, routine and habit dull my senses.

Easter is coming along just in time to wake me up, to remind me that while the life of a faith demands that I not turn my back on the pain and brokenness, failure and injustice and disappointment of the world, that same life of faith also insists that I remain observant of, witness to the ever-present hope, possibility, justice-making, and love of the world. I'm grateful that I'll soon be back among you taking up that joyous work—on Easter and every day.

See you in church.

Easter Week 1982, by Robert R. Walsh

The light green shoots of blossoms-to-have-been are out of sight under the drifting snow. Gale force winds are rattling the old house. The temperature is far below freezing. Nature is not cooperating with preparations for Easter.

The storm evokes the spiritual quality of Good Friday more than Easter. New life will appear, but not without strife, not without some losses to the coldness which returns as inevitably as spring. And who can say that the sun will always climb again on Easter morning? Isn't it at least possible that the coldness has more staying power than the warmth?

The seasons are more reliable in these matters than human nature. For we, individually and collectively, can choose between love and indifference, between commitment and self-absorption, between peace and war. And we have often chosen the coldness.

Maybe the ancients were right. Maybe the spring comes because we bid it to come in our celebrations. Maybe it is the telling and the retelling of the stories that enable us to see that hope still lives and that we can carry it forward.

The stories make it clear that God does not do it alone. The motions of the spheres will produce a sunrise, but the springtime of the spirit, the springtime of love and justice and peace, depends on our human response to the gift of life.

Let us tell the stories again.
